With that background and so much experience, I can help you make the best decision with Lightroom. As always, I've run it in a virtual machine and use 15 I7 processors with a video card (GTX 1080) to demonstrate maxed out performance. I connected two monitors, with a Razer keyboard and a cool LED setup for a monitor, and started work. Although I'm used to a bright monitor for the first hour or two of work, I switched to a laptop monitor for the second half of my working time, to demonstrate better portability. The resolution is 100% zoomed out, but it's enough for me to show you what's different in Lightroom 5. You can click on the image for a larger preview. Also, James Podolsky, our lead reviewer, has a set of photography courses on Gale Learn. You can purchase individually, or go for the entire package. There's no obligation to buy more, so perhaps start with the basic package for Lightroom. Page 1: In Lightroom 5, you can add missing metadata and adjust your camera information more easily. You can also choose how the initial active selection is carried into your image. Now, it is titled Active Selection. Also, the grid options are more intuitive. If you drag the zoom to 50% or zoom to 100% and then drag again, you'll see more of your image. The default setting for grids is 50%. I've expanded to 100%, and chose a grid size of 5%, as shown in the image. The general trend within the delta system seems to be the one, where a few small updates are made to the basic editing tools. And the one feature I wish for is some sort of automated alignment / resizing. Of course, neither of these two are "new features," but they seem to have been out for quite some time. I know of people who have Photoshop CC for several years and still need to manually rectify the same issue with their images. How annoying! Finally, I would love if we could upload images from the internet, instead of only forcing us to duplicate them six times into our stock.
