Labor has warned the Turnbull government to change its internal policies before the law changes that could see more asylum seekers sent offshore to a Pacific island town that has been boycotted by the United Nations and Australia's allies. The shadow immigration minister, Scott Morrison, said Labor was determined to reduce the number of boat arrivals and would not tolerate people who came by boat "shipping out". "That's the reason the Labor party has made the decision we will oppose this legislation unless there are significant changes to it that balance the community safety objectives," he told reporters in Canberra. "There are only a handful of cases that involve vulnerable persons, and we only need to make sure that there are other options to Australia." Labor will oppose the legislation next week if it remains unchanged. But in a statement on Tuesday, the government said it was confident it could win the vote. It is understood the government has held back on introducing legislation to fast track the offshore processing plan until Labor was in government, and it has been waiting for the remoteness provisions of its plan to reduce the number of people arriving by boat to be passed before putting it to parliament. But Labor's opposition in the lower house is said to be more carefully coordinated than it was in September, when it did not bring forward a new bill. The opposition shadow immigration minister, Shayne Neumann, is concerned about the voting on detainees provisions, which will see detainees reviewed by a panel of the immigration minister. Nauru has been offered to the US under its so-called "enhanced cooperation" arrangement as a result of the Obama administration's agreement with Australia to resettle some refugees. Labor has raised concerns about the Nauru agreement, which was set up in the aftermath of the 2009 death in offshore detention of a 47-year-old Iranian asylum seeker, Reza Berati. In July, Guardian Australia revealed that Labor intended to challenge the agreement if it was struck. The immigration minister, Peter Dutton, has said the government would have a clear position on the Nauru agreement when it introduced its asylum seeker policy on Tuesday. In a Senate estimates hearing in September, the Australian reported that Labor was in discussions with the US about its resettlement deal with Nauru.
