"Endemic" refers to a range of disease levels maintained around a stable point. The differential equation describing the equilibrium point is a nonlinear second-order polynomial. When the disease is in an endemic equilibrium (meaning that the number of cases or deaths is constant through time), the growth rate of new cases is approximately constant through time and approximately equal to the growth rate of the total number of cases in the population. An epidemic can be initiated by a new case or by a change in the total number of cases in the population; these types of epidemics do not necessarily destroy the equilibrium and have different properties. A change in the demographic rates of the population can result in the epidemic being more severe. The epidemic can be considered to be endemic, approaching asymptotically an equilibrium level or it can continue to grow. When the rate of growth of new cases is greater than the rate of growth of the total number of cases, it is called an epidemic. The analysis of endemic diseases can be divided into three levels: (1) the characteristics of the disease, (2) the dynamics of the disease, and (3) the model of the dynamics of the disease. In this paper we review some of the important issues in each of these three areas."Arylamine N-acetyltransferase activity in human benign and malignant urothelial tissues. Arylamine N-acetyltransferase (NAT) activity was measured in a panel of human urothelial tumours and in the urothelium surrounding normal ureters. Urothelial NAT activity was significantly higher in tumours than in urothelium from normal ureters, both in the native and ADP/Virolotine p-nitroanilidyl substrates. Urothelial NAT activity was not significantly correlated with tumour grade or stage, but the NAT activity was significantly higher in non-papillary and in invasive urothelial carcinomas. Because NAT protects the cells
