I have a very specific question :) Using Algolia, the documentation suggests I use IIFEs everywhere (ex. function buildSuggestions() {} My question is how can I relate that to a function that returns an array of some objects? What if that function returns an array of objects that need to be listed in the search results? How can I extract the values from that 'array of objects'? How can I relate that to the IIFE? Thanks in advance A: You're right about how to extract the values. If you have a function that returns an object, the result of that function needs to be assigned to a variable.

After downloading, installing, and using Photoshop Elements for some time, I have discovered one serious flaw. The app's file-management system is not that intuitive. There are two ways to import a photo to the app: using the Import dialog, and using the Import button in the dock. It calls to mind a duality of methods, and it's not always intuitive. Working with the Elements app — for me, Photoshop — is quite different from working with a raw file. Along with the most important adjustments you'll probably make to an image, there are often details you'll need to try and delete, or maybe bring up with the Lasso tool. While Photoshop Elements is great for making adjustments — though I don't use it as much, or as frequently as I should — I rarely use the simple corrections that Photoshop makes on the fly. If you frequently make minor adjustments to a photo, you may want to use a non-destructive option. For example, I often use the blur tool when I want to remove small things that aren't in focus, or when I'm trying to brighten an image without it looking too artificial. I'm not nearly as picky about the specifics of sharpening, though; that's what Photoshop Elements is really good at. I don't use it much, but if you do, I highly recommend it. For this review, I'm going to check out the changes in the latest releases of Photoshop CS and Photoshop CC. If you are eager to see all the new updates, what about Photoshop 2019, you may continue reading.
