I use rsync to backup some files on my linux server. I want to change options like: rsync -rv -a /some/file /some/other/file and I know how to do this in linux command line by adding each option as a single argument in the shell. But what if the options are being passed in from a file, like this: arguments.txt: /some/file /some/other/file script.sh: #!/bin/bash ... while read line do # echo "$line" done < arguments.txt ... I would love to write something like this: #!/bin/bash # arguments.txt /some/file /some/other/file arguments.txt: -rv -a /some/file /some/other/file So the question is how to write a script that would read in the above options from the file, pass them into the shell, and run rsync? A: bash enables you to parse arguments with "parameter=value" syntax. You can pass options/parameters to your script as a text file with param=value syntax. You would then need to split up the parameter values on spaces, and send them to a loop. eval $(awk -F= '$1
